Beginning in the mid 1800's settlers have attempted to drain and control water flow in Southern Florida. These efforts were part of a desire to build settlements and agricultural farms in the area. As a result the vast everglades ecosystem which once covered over 28,500 sq. km (11,000 sq. miles) has receded to less than half its original size. This map is a visual representation of that recession.