Scriptural and doctrinal knowledge were of the utmost importance to the “de kleyne luyden” (common people) who, with their leaders, established the Christian Reformed Church in the United States and Canada. When these individuals immigrated to America, many carried with them a Staten Bijbel (Bible translation approved by the Synod of Dort) similar in size to the pulpits Bibles used in our churches today. Arnold Mulder in his book, Americans From Holland, has written that “Dutch folk, even some of the most illiterate of them, were theologians by instinct.” People such as these judged the contents of their ministers’ sermons with singular discernment and demanded spiritual leaders who had the ability to both quote Scripture and expound at length on various points of doctrine. Those who attended services in the few churches of the fledgling denomination hoped that the Seminary, founded in 1876, would supply educated clergies to fill the vacant pulpits and also provide future pastors.

The Calvin Theological Seminary occupied the second floor of Grand Rapids’ Williams Street Christian School during the years 1876-1892. According to Seminary Professor Martin J. Wyngaarden (1891-1978), there was in this building “in the southeast corner a separate small room for books, including mostly old Reformed writings.” The first Yearbook of the Christian Reformed Church in which a Bibliothecarius (Dutch for Librarian) is listed is the one dated 1892. One of the three Seminary professors, Rev. Gerrit E. Boer (1832-1904), had this title and retained it until 1904, the year of his death. No doubt, Boer’s many duties included responsibility for the “library room,” located in the northeast corner on the main floor of the new Theological School and Calvin College Building on the corner of Madison and Franklin Streets. Students and faculty members made use of this building for the first time in 1892.

In the Calvin College Yearbook for 1895-1896, there is this description of the “Library and Reading Room”:

> A large, well-lighted room has been set apart for a reading room. Here will be found at all times good books, magazines, and papers.

Incidentally, a student was allowed to draw out one book at a time for three days, and if the borrower desired, he might renew the book for a similar period. During the years 1905-1914, Seminary Professor Gerrit K. Hemkes (1838-1920) served as Librarian. Reporting to the Board of Trustees in 1910, he mentioned that seventy books had been added to the collection during the past school year and that the collection now numbered about 4,000 volumes. Following Hemkes as Librarian in 1914 was Professor Ralph Janssen (1874-1942), Professor of Exegetical Theology in the Seminary.

This first building on the “new” Franklin Campus was the Administration Building and the library was relocated there during 1917. The books were transferred in a move which then Assistant Librarian Ralph Stob chronicled in the following manner:

> The books were hauled by truck, but through the loading and unloading, the arrangement in their proper order was completely gone. Just to put the books in their proper place on the shelf was a gigantic task.

The library’s new quarters were two basement rooms, one a reading room and the other a stack room. Not pleased with the subterranean location, Librarian Janssen penned these words in his 1920 report to the Board:

> Ever since our removal to the new College building it has been a regrettable circumstance that obliged us relegating the library to the basement-room. A more undesirable place for a library could not well be wanted.

From 1922 through 1926 the Librarian was Professor Ralph Stob (1894-1965), whose primary responsibility was teaching Greek in the College. Neither Stob nor his predecessors were full-time librarians. What they did as librarians was in addition to their teaching tasks, which each considered the more significant part of his calling in life. During Janssen’s tenure, Stob had, as he writes, “made a careful study of Dewey and indexed accordingly.” The reading room of the library was opened afternoons for the first time in 1925. The hours were from one to three in the afternoon. Prior to this, the library opened its doors for student use from about eight to twelve in the morning only. Pressure from students caused the change and a student rhapsodized in the November 1915 Chimes:

> Isn’t it grand and glorious to find the library open in the afternoon when you want to study for that three o’clock class and are tired of sitting on the floor in the waiting room trying to keep the babble of voices out of your ears sufficiently to concentrate on that awful Archaeology?

By the way, the “waiting room” referred to was not a part of the library but a sort of social sanctuary provided for the students.

Stob resigned in 1926 and gave as his reason that “the work is too much to carry in addition to all the teaching.” The library now, as Stob pointed out, had 13,800 volumes. When he had started as Assistant Librarian in 1915 the collection numbered 3,500. Stob closed his note of resignation with this... remark, "I should hail the day when we had one person for the library alone." In a document, Instructions from Prof. Stob, Librarian, ostensibly written for his successor, Miss Johanna Timmer, there appears the following:

On this day, the seventh of January, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and twenty-seven, I, Ralph Stob, do depart this life of librarian of the Theological School and Calvin College of the Christian Reformed Church in America. I have labored long and now I rest my weary head.

For the brief period from 1927 to 1928, Miss Johanna Timmer served as both librarian and Girls' Adviser. Her parting words were:

I trust you can appreciate my position in asserting that the positions of Girls' Adviser and of Librarian do not dovetail into each other. . . . I rejoice that the faculties are at this time recommending the appointment of a full-time librarian.

Interesting to note are the costs submitted by Miss Timmer in her report dated May 1928. Behind them appear the current Library figures.

Books $1229.23 Now $135,000
Periodicals 267.97 Now 95,000
Binding 280.65 Now 24,000

The Hekman Memorial Library was dedicated on March 8, 1928. Prior to the dedication, the books had been moved from the Administration Building in one day's time under the supervision of Librarian Timmer. About this new structure the 1928 Prism reported:

The Hekman Memorial Library now stands upon our campus a tribute to the memory of Edsko Hekman, because his widow and his sons, Henry, John, and Jelle, felt that his life, now ended on earth, must nevertheless go on here: in the impulses and works of those chosen to impound the master spirits of the age.

In the hearts and minds of those that love Calvin, unfailing gratitude will live while stone and mortar shall last.

Editor Dr. Henry Beets devoted almost a page and a half of the March 16, 1928 Banner to the dedicatory ceremonies. There is a report of the sequence of events and extensive resumes of all speeches. Among those who spoke were S. H. Ranck, Librarian of the Grand Rapids Public Library, and Seminary Professor Louis Berkhof. In one of his closing paragraphs Beets said:

We are sure of it that the dedication of the new building was greatly enjoyed by people from nearby as well as from far away. May God continue to shower his blessings upon those who donated the building, as well as upon those who continue to use it.

After the resignation of Miss Timmer, Miss Elizabeth Vertret, later Mrs. Floris Vander Stoep, became the first full-time librarian to serve the College and Seminary. She held this position from 1928 until 1931 when she, too, submitted a resignation:

As I was married in April, I shall be resigning from my duties as librarian in August. As I look back over the years, the work accomplished seems slight, but I hope I have contributed something to the progress of the library.

By 1931 the library had 19,800 books, most of which had book pockets and cards placed in them during the summer of 1930, a feat accomplished by the Librarian and two assistants in six week's time. Also, in conjunction with the English Department, Miss Vertret prepared lectures for freshmen students on how to use the library. This activity on the part of the Librarian was something of an innovation at the time.

Known to many as Josie, Miss Josephine Baker took the place of Miss Vertret in the fall of 1931. Miss Baker's picture appeared on the front page of Chimes and next to the picture were these words of introduction:

She entered library work because she likes it and intends to continue it—well, indefinitely. But we have our doubts. In fact, our only objection to Miss Baker is that she is a blonde. And since "gentlemen prefer blondes," we fear that she will follow in the path of her predecessor, Miss Vertret, who, being a blonde also, left us this summer to gladden the life of the seminarian who preferred her.

Writing in the May 1, 1941 issue of the Calvin College Alumni Letter, Miss Baker stated that the library now had 25,500 cataloged books of which 8,000 had been added during the last ten years. Also, she mentioned that the library subscribed to about 100 periodicals. At the close of her article, Miss Baker urged those who had never been in the library to "make a point to see the building," and she also affirmed that "we are proud of our library, both the building and the book collection."

After World War II, neither library study space nor the book collection was adequate for the greatly increased enrollment. The December 10, 1946 Chimes contained a quotation from Librarian Baker who remarked that "a new addition to the library is definitely needed, and for this addition—new
The library situation in these rather blunt sentences which appeared in a 1947 Banner article:

But it is too small, much too small. There is not room enough for the books, and there is not room enough to study them. The building served 400 students well a few years ago; it cannot serve 1,200 students well now. As for study space, there are chairs in the reading room for 140 students, as closely packed as spoons in a box. During the busy hours of a regular school day, each of these chairs is occupied. Even so, some students must study elbow to chin, under the campus trees, or slumped against their lockers in the basement of the main building. Calvin's librarian is highly trained, is devoted to her work, and she has good assistants, but the opportunities for service are infinite and the hours are limited.

Also in 1947, Calvin President Henry Schultz alerted the Board to the problems concerning the library structure. Schultz chose to relay these ominous words of warning presented to him by Miss Baker:

There are deep cracks, growing deeper, in the floors and the walls. Plaster is constantly loosening up and falling. Some of the doors are no longer serviceable because of the settling of the building.

Decisions were made to enlarge the library and on March 16, 1951 the "new" library was dedicated. Now students and faculty found that the library contained a reference room with mahogany tables and captain's chairs, a reading room with blond furniture, and also a periodical reading room. The closed stacks could accommodate 120,000 volumes and seating capacity was 240, 100 more than before. Those who attended Calvin in the fifties and sixties have vivid memories of the "blond room" and the "dark room."

The December 15, 1950 Chimes reported the news that the library committee had proposed a Faculty Library Director who will "take over duties of deciding policy and making long-range plans." Professor of Speech Lester De Koster was appointed by the 1951 Synod to this position. Also in 1951, Miss Barbara Sluiter, presently in charge of Cataloging Services, joined the library staff.

Miss Baker had served as Librarian from the fall of 1931 through the summer of 1951. In her 1932 report, she stated that 560 books had been cataloged during the past year; by 1949 the number was 1000. For many years Miss Baker was Calvin's only professionally trained librarian; after 1951 she served as Reader's Adviser, a position she held until 1964, her last year of service. Students found Miss Baker a very helpful person; a 1940 Prism states:

To Miss Baker, our librarian, we extend a word of appreciation for her patience and cooperation in assisting us with our book selections and reference material. Patient, kind, and helpful, we have learned to rely on her in the solution of our problems connected with outside work.

Her thirty-four years of service made her a very familiar figure on campus to many students, especially those whom she kindly but firmly asked to stop talking.

During the De Koster era, which covered the years 1951-1969, many significant events occurred. In 1951, a friend and neighbor of Calvin, Mr. Leo Cayvan, donated his collection of 9,000 records to the library and these were housed in the Cayvan Room located in the basement of the Hekman Library. Presently, the Cayvan Room is located on the third floor of the library and serves both the casual listener and the music student who desires to hear class assignments.

From the Deting estate the library received 4,000 books in 1954. Also, this was the year the library acquired its first microfilm reader, a venture with great possibilities for the future, since at the time the library had but one film. After seven years of service, Miss Wilhemina Twight, later Mrs. Jer- rald White, left the staff in 1955. Her place as Circulation Librarian was taken by Miss Annette Buurstra. Perforated Mcbee Keysort Call Cards, the kind still filled out today by all who borrow books at Calvin, were used for the first time in 1957. The house at 752 Giddings became the "Library Annex" in 1959. Here there was space for about fifty students to study under the watchful eye of Mr. Albert Lewen. The decade of the fifties closed with Director De Koster's suggestion that the library gather all materials available on John Calvin and Calvinism in book and microform. He hoped that the library would become the major resource center in North America for the study of Calvin and Calvinism.

Planning sessions for the new library building to be erected on the Knollcrest Campus took many hours of library staff time during the early sixties. A shift from the Dewey Decimal System to the Library of Congress System had begun in 1951 and by 1960 all but 8,000 out of a collection of 85,000 volumes had been reclassified. Students who came to the library in the fall of 1960 had 7,560 more books than the year before to choose from. Also, 795 current periodical titles were present for their perusal.

Van Raalte's books, letters and sermons came to the library in 1962 as a gift from the publisher William B. Eerdmans, Sr. For both faculty and student research, this collection is without peer due to the fact that Rev. Van Raalte and his followers began the settlement in Holland, Michigan, in 1847. Since 1963, this collection, with many others, has been housed in the Colonial Origins Collection, formerly known as the Heritage Hall Historical Collections. For nineteen years the Colonial Origins Collection has occupied several rooms on the south side of the first floor of the library. Herbert Brinks, Curator of the Colonial Origins Collection and Denomina- tional Archivist, first began working with the materials in 1963. Through his efforts and those of others, the collection has greatly expanded and now includes books, pamphlets, periodicals, letters, and archives of the Christian Reformed Church and related institutions. All these resources are essential for anyone who wishes to search out past information about the Christian Reformed Church or the Dutch people in the United States and Canada.

Three librarians, Conrad Bult, Marvin Monsma, and Myr- tle Van Laar, joined the staff in 1963, followed by Miss Evelyn Weidenaa in 1966. Miss Van Laar left the staff in 1971, Adriana Velthoen and Sierd Woudstra served as theological librarians in the late sixties. New to the staff in 1969 were Peter De Klerk, Theological Librarian, and Stephen Lambers who, when he came, was in charge of Circulation and Information Services.
library facilities are now beginning to show signs of being inadequate.

His 1979 comments about space were:
When the present library facility was built, it was to have a capacity for a 325,000-volume collection. It was predicted that this capacity would be adequate for ten years of growth. The book and periodical collection now totals approximately 290,000 volumes.

Once again the problem of space which had haunted all previous directors had returned to face Monsma and all others on the staff. Future plans for expansion will be completed only after many sessions in which architects, librarians, administrators, and faculty will air their views.

This somewhat anecdotal history of the library for the years 1876-1980 can not, of course, include all the names of students, assistants, and professional librarians who made the library what it is today after more than a century of existence. The intellectual edifice given the name Calvin College and Seminary Library is the result of the hard work, sacrifice, hope, and vision of all who can identify with the library in one way or another. Included in this “All” are past and present faculty members in the College and Seminary, past and present donors who have given or continue to give money or books, and, last but not least, all alumni, each of whom we hope has fond memories of the time spent studying, reading, or doing whatever in the library.

THE PRESENT

What Goes Into Putting a Book on the Shelf?

There are a third of a million books in Calvin’s library. Approximately ten thousand are added every year. How do they get there? What goes into putting a book on the shelf? To begin with, who chooses what to buy? At Calvin this is the prerogative of the College and Seminary faculty. The 1981-82 budget for books amounts to $148,000. More than twenty percent of this will be spent on religious and theological works. Librarians order books particularly for the reference collection but also in areas where lacunae (gaps) in the collection may be developing.

To assist the faculty in selecting the best newly published books in their respective disciplines, the library subscribes to a reviewing service of Choice magazine. Choice provides cards containing 200- to 300-word reviews of new scholarly books. Written by persons learned in the particular subject area, they provide a more objective view than that which is given in the biased “blurbs” of the publisher.

The next step in the process is the purchase of the books. At Calvin, Johanna Duyst has that responsibility. To the uninitiated the ordering and receiving procedures appear routine, but they are not. Knowledge of the complexities of bibliographic entry, familiarity with methods of tracking down and obtaining cryptic foreign titles, and firm dealing with those who would be your agents (book jobbers) make it necessary to have a trained professional doing the work. Jo says, “Acquisi-
How Important Is the Library to the Student?

The Calvin Library lies at a major campus intersection with the Commons to the north, the Fine Arts Center to the east, the Seminary to the south, and the College Center to the west. Thus it is not by happenstance that it is the focus of daily activities for many students. When the semester ends and the students have left, the Library seems like a church auditorium on a weekday.

Along with the expected activities of reading, research, and study, the library is also used as a place for making photo copies, listening to recorded music, socializing, staring out the window, and sleeping. Romances are carried on there. So too are disputes—like the one on study space about which we found the following exchange of notes between one M. E. V. H. and various respondents:

I do not object to others using this carrel when I am not here. But, regardless of the supposedly great demand for this study space, it is imperative that these books remain here; but greedy librarians are persona non grata.

M. E. V. H.

Librarians are not greedy. They are simply doing their job. If you need these books please check them out so that people can know where they are and so others may use them after your two weeks. Until you check out your books, everyone has a right to use them and they will be put back on the shelves.

D. J.

All these books belong to me. I will have much difficulty “checking them out.”

M. E. V. H.

I do not see how you can reserve the right to claim this carrel. Of course we will use it if you are not here; in fact, if you do happen to appear while it is in use we have the right to continue to use it.

Thank you.

H. B.

Very true! However, I understand why you don’t understand how I have “the right to claim this carrel.” I think the reason lies in the fact that I haven’t reserved the right to “claim” the carrel. I thought my first note made that clear.

M. E. V. H.
This carrel is not a private bookshelf; it never has been and never will be. So beat it, before the day you come and find your books have been taken.

The Lady in Red:
You have accused me of "stealing" public property. Though I think you're not all wrong (nor all right), still, were you to take my books you would be no less guilty, only you would be stealing private property!

M.E.V.H.

This carrel is for all to use on a first-come, first-served basis (without squatting). So grow up or get out!

Innocent Observer:
If it's true you're innocent then maybe you ought to "grow up." I have never denied that "this carrel is for all to use on a first-come, first-served basis." I'm here first and you're not.

M.E.V.H.

What Are the Most Distinctive Features of the Library?

Surely one of the most imposing sets of books in the Calvin Library is the National Union Catalog Pre-1956 Imprints published by the Mansell Company of England and comprised of a cumulative author listing of Library of Congress printed catalog cards. Like the Washington Cathedral in that it seems as though it will always be unfinished, it nevertheless is nearing completion. Presently consisting of 715 10" x 14" volumes, each 698 pages long, it occupies 123 feet of shelf space. A conservative estimate of the number of books on which it gives full bibliographic information is ten million. It is the largest single listing of books in the world. Books published since 1956 are recorded in five-year cumulations also called the National Union Catalog, but with the appropriate dates added to the title.

Another bibliographic tool (that we could hardly do without, now that we have it) is the computer terminal connecting Calvin with the Online Computer Library Center (OCLC). Allowing bibliographic access to the holdings of more than 2400 public and academic libraries in the United States and Canada, it is invaluable to several library activities, including research, acquisitions, cataloging, and interlibrary loan. Calvin joined the network in December 1975 and is currently engaged not only entering its current book and periodical additions into the data base, but its retrospective holdings as well. Based in Dublin, Ohio, OCLC has now opened an overseas office in Birmingham, England, to market its computer services to libraries in Great Britain and Europe.

Forty-thousand sermons contained in the Library's collection of religious and theological books are cited in the Sermon Index. Begun in the 1950's by the late Dr. Clarence and Mrs. Tess Bouma and presently carried on by Peter De Klerk, its arrangement is by scripture text, from Genesis to Revelation. Some ministers consult the Sermon Index regularly for assistance in preparation of their sermons.

Also a project undertaken by our own professional personnel, the Index to Religious Periodicals, is of great assistance to anyone desiring to know the point of view of the Christian Reformed Church on a given topic. This card catalog opens the way to the contents of such church-related periodicals as The Banner, Outlook, Reformed Journal, Insight, and The Christian Home and School (but, unfortunately, not De Waechter, that has its own index).

The most outstanding special collection in the library is undoubtedly the Calvin-Calvinism Collection already described by Dr. John Primus in the May issue of Spark. Characteristic of the bibliographic sleuthing talents of its compiler, Peter De Klerk, it is an exhaustive bringing together of books, dissertations, monographs, magazines, and articles having to do with our namesake and his teachings.

When did your parents (or grandparents) come from "the old country?" How old were they and what compelled them to leave their native land? If you have Dutch ancestry, the Library's Colonial Origins Collection may supply answers to a few of the questions about your roots. Dutch Ship Lists 1820-1880, a computer printout of Dutch immigrants on United States passenger lists, is available there. So too are church membership records and such books as Henry Lucas' Dutch Immigrant Memoirs and Related Writings and Linda Doezena's Dutch Americans: A Guide to Information Sources. Administered by archivist Dr. Herbert Brinks, the Colonial Origins Collection also contains abundant resources on the history of the Denomination, its churches, and its college and seminary. In addition to books, this material includes newspapers, pamphlets, photographs, tapes, correspondence, minutes, and memorabilia.

During the last few years Conrad Bult and Stephen Lambers have been collecting for the Library pristine first editions of books authored by Calvin alumni who have received national literacy recognition. These persons include Peter De Vries, Frederick Manfred, the two De Jong brothers (David Cornel and Meindert), Wessel Smitter, William Brashier, and David Den Boer. There are also short stories, essays, and poems written by and about the authors. This collection is open for research.

The name "Cayvan" is not universally known at Calvin (nor is it Dutch), but alumni who were music majors in the 1950's may remember that Mr. Cayvan was the person who invited students into his home (near the old campus) to play stringed instruments. In 1952 he gave to Calvin his valuable collection of recorded classical music and later on a large number of musical scores. Today the records, along with many others since purchased, are housed in the Cayvan Room, a special area for music lovers and learners.

The Calvin Library is one of two federal depository libraries in the Fifth Congressional District of Michigan. Materials as diverse as a chart showing the spread of pellets from a shotgun blast to the cheap paper, staple-bound issues of the Federal Register and the Congressional Record all come to Calvin free of charge. Index Medicus is there and so are pamphlets sounding warnings on the dangers of smoking to pregnant women. The Government Documents Collection is like a library within a library, having its own books, periodicals, indexes, and system of classification. Though it looks forbidding, a great amount of useful (and useless) information can be found in this myriad gathering of government publications.

Who Are Calvin's Librarians?

Six persons, with faculty status, presently constitute the Library's full-time professional staff. They are: Marvin Monsma, Library Director.

Marv began his library career at Calvin in 1965 as an assistant librarian and since 1969 has been Director. Under his capable leadership the Library has moved into a new facility, doubled its holdings, and joined the OCLC network. He has served on several committees involving inter-library cooperation and technical advancement and is a well-known figure in the Michigan Library Consortium.

Conrad Bult, Assistant Director of College-Related Matters.

Conrad came as a librarian to Calvin in 1965 and has held his present position since 1977. Conrad is a true bibliophile and the library's real expert on rare books. Like the pursuer in Frances Thompson's Hound of Heaven, Conrad runs "down the labyrinthine ways" in search of answers to reference questions. He has written book reviews for such journals as the Christian Scholar's Review and the Journal of Ethnic Studies.
Johanna Duyst, Acquisitions Librarian

Jo began working in the cataloging department of the Calvin Library in 1968 and in 1977 received faculty status as acquisitions librarian. Since 1979 she has served on OCLC's Advisory Committee on Acquisitions, a rather significant position, considering the size of the network.

Barbara Sluiter, Cataloger

Barbara Sluiter has been a librarian at Calvin for her entire professional career—twenty-five years. In fact, Barbara began her library career following graduation from Calvin in 1951, working as an assistant at the library. Her fellow librarians believe she is unsurpassed in her field. Not withstanding her longevity of service, she has been readily receptive of innovations brought into library technical services by the computer.

Peter De Klerk, Assistant Library Director for Seminary-Related Matters

Peter De Klerk arrived at Calvin as theological librarian in 1969. A meticulous and indefatigable chaser of bibliographic data in his chosen field, Peter has as one of his current projects the annual Calvin bibliographies. He has traveled to university libraries throughout the United States, Canada, and Western Europe. His most recent published compilation is A Bibliography of the Writings of the Professors of Calvin Theological Seminary (1981). Stephen Lamberts, Information Services/Government Documents Librarian

Steve was appointed to the first half of his present position in 1969 and to the latter half in 1980, succeeding Mr. John Smilde. During the past several years he has been involved in compiling a bibliography of the books and doctoral dissertations of Calvin faculty and alumni. The 1976 publication, A Centenary Bibliography, was an outgrowth of this continuing project.

Along with these six people there are many other full-time and part-time persons who make up the regular library staff and contribute to the services offered by the library.

THE FUTURE

by Marvin E. Monsma

What on earth is the "library world" coming to? Read a newspaper on a television screen! Punch a few keys on a computer terminal and walk away with a speedily-printed subject bibliography! Terms like: teletext, videodisc, electronic newspaper, microcomputers, online catalog! The "library world" is rapidly approaching, if not already experiencing, the "information age."

Technology is revolutionizing the library. During the seventies, competing networks have covered the country. Using constantly improving computer technology, libraries have automated numerous library procedures, among which are cataloging, interlibrary loans, and serials control. Online circulation systems are becoming more commonplace. Acquisition capabilities are in various stages of development. Online catalogs are opening the door to online union catalogs, allowing patrons in one library to discover the holdings of hundreds of other libraries throughout the country.

Until now, most of the library applications of computer technology have been a manipulation of records of publications printed on paper. In the near future we can expect many new publications to be available only in electronic form. We appear now to be in a transitional phase. Will it pave the way to a completely paperless communication system? If so, how soon, and with what effects on academic libraries?

What are the implications of all these new technological developments for the Calvin College and Seminary Library? Obviously we would like to take advantage of as many as would serve our patrons better and be economically feasible. Therein lies the dilemma. We must automate to move ahead. To automate requires a substantial monetary investment in new technology, higher standards, and expanded capabilities.

Currently the only automated process in the Calvin Library is cataloging. By means of a cathode ray terminal, we communicate with the Online Computer Library Center located in Ohio to accomplish this function. Many inter-library loan requests are received via the terminal also. We still place our own requests by using the paper forms, considering that method to be more economical.

Through membership in the Michigan Library Consortium, we are affiliated with the OCLC national network. OCLC has recently developed and is currently testing automated acquisitions. Circulation control is in the planning stage. We would like to see both systems operative in the Calvin Library. Once the systems are perfected and made available, we shall have to determine whether or not they are cost advantageous in a library the size of ours. The demand placed on us for online bibliographic searching has been minimal thus far and our needs in this area have been met by channeling our requests through larger state institutions that provide this service.
In January 1980, President Diekema appointed an ad hoc committee to study the question of how the use of new library technology could affect the future need for space in the library. That committee concluded that in a library serving the needs of a liberal-arts college and a theological seminary, space requirements would be little affected by the new technology—that is, it would not reduce the additional amounts of space the library required. Thus, with an eye on the rapidly developing technology, we have begun planning for expansion of the library. Built in 1970, the library was designed to accommodate a collection of approximately 325,000 volumes, and it was projected that it would meet our needs for the next ten years. Now, eleven years later, we have a collection totalling 330,000 books and bound periodicals. The time for us to move to the basement level, originally planned for library expansion, or to add another floor, is rapidly approaching. The Theological Division of the library is particularly congested and in need of additional space to accommodate books and patrons.

The H. H. Meeter Calvin-Calvinism Research Collection, integral with and housed in the Theological Division, is especially in need of expanded quarters. With the establishment of the Center for Calvin Studies, this need will be accentuated. A new three-story addition to the south end of Heritage Hall is planned to accommodate the rapidly growing Calvin-Calvinism Collection (Third Floor), the Calvin Center for Christian Scholarship (Second Floor) and Heritage Hall and Colonial Origins (First Floor).

Besides staying abreast of technological changes and planning for physical expansion, the library staff is dedicated to providing the best possible service for the Calvin faculties, students, and other patrons.

Three recently initiated programs—the Master of Arts in Teaching, the Master of Arts in Christian Studies, and the new nursing program—and numerous new courses will require books and periodicals to support the curriculum. With the specialized help of the teaching faculty, we shall continue to build the collection to meet curricular needs.

WARNING
Those students in the library caught mumbling under their breath, audibly removing and replacing false teeth, or breathing too heavily will be subject to heavy fines and possible imprisonment.

Gum-chewing is strictly forbidden, especially in its nosier forms, while it is even suggested that shoes might be left at the door to promote a more enduring peace and tranquility. "The Library Police always get their man," said Warden Baker in a special communication to the Dissociated Press, and warned future inmates that no stone would be left unturned and no expense would be spared in the prosecution and conviction of offenders. LIBRARY REPORTS RARE PERIODICAL LOSS
The library reports that both its copies of the current Banner have been surreptitiously removed from their Proper Place. Their present location as well as the identity of the edified culprit remains a mystery to even the oldest and wisest of the sleuths on the Library Investigation Staff, Surreptitious Banner Removals Department. Discussion is now being held regarding the purchase of several heavy iron chains with which to bind De Wachter to the library desks. Meanwhile, everyone is advised to be on the lookout for a desperate-but-edified looking suspect.
